Eight miles west of Folsom, New Mexico, a group of paleontologists found two pieces of chipped flint with the fossilized bones of a kind of beaver which has been extinct for thousands of years. These pieces of flint are known as Folsom Points. Several years later, other similar flint points were found with the skeletons of over 20 large bison.

All the bison lacked tail bones indicating that the animals had been slain by man;
for when an animal is skinned, its tail is removed.
